Justices will decide securities case issue

Amgen asks high court to answer whether plaintiffs must prove materiality early on

By Robert Iafolla
Daily Journal Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court agreed Monday to hear a Southern California biotechnology company's challenge to a judgment allowing investors to band together and collectively sue the company for allegedly manipulating its stock price.

Despite Amgen Inc.'s arguments to the contrary, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held that the investors don't have to show they took the company's alleged misrepresentations into account in order for a district judge to certify them as a class. In other words, the circuit ruled plaintiffs don't need to demonstrate the misrepresentations were material in order to sue as a group.

Overturing the 9th Circuit decision on materiality could shift the playing field for securities class actions.

"If the Supreme Court should hold that proof of materiality is a prerequisite for class certification, it would greatly strengthen the defendant's hand and further weaken class-action procedures," said James D. Cox, a professor at Duke University School of Law and an expert on securities law.

Class certification is especially critical in securities fraud cases, legal experts said. Failure can make it economically infeasible for plaintiffs to pursue their claims. Conversely, success grants plaintiffs enormous leverage to pressure defendants to settle.

Plaintiffs filed more than 750 securities fraud class actions in the 9th Circuit between 1996 and 2011, or nearly one out of every four filed nationwide, according to data collected by the Stanford Securities Fraud Class Action Clearinghouse for an amicus brief urging the court to take the case. Those class actions have led to about $7.6 billion in settlements.

Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds filed a fraud-on-the-market lawsuit against Amgen claiming the Thousand Oaks-based biotech giant covered up safety concerns about a pair of its products used to treat anemia, thus artificially pumping up the price of its stock. That class would cover anyone who purchased Amgen stock between the April 2004 date of the first alleged lies and the May 2007 date when the truth was purportedly revealed and the stock price dropped.

Specifically, the investors claim Amgen downplayed the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's concerns about the company's drugs, concealed details about a cancelled clinical

Public Counsel flexes muscle

Nation's largest legal nonprofit has tackled increasingly bigger issues

By Jason W. Armstrong
Daily Journal Staff Writer

Public Counsel's Shashi Hanuman didn't mince words in a May 21 public statement about a letter the legal nonprofit shot off to the Los Angeles planning department assailing the environmental study of the city's massive downtown Farmers Field football stadium project.

"The neighborhoods around downtown need to stay affordable," said Hanuman, the organization's director of community development. "The draft report does not sufficiently analyze how the project will affect rents and housing prices" in surrounding areas.

The nonprofit's letter, co-written with the Legal Aid Foundation of Los Angeles, was the latest in a three-year string of bolder, more controversial stands Public Counsel has taken on issues like housing protections for poor people, immigrants' rights and imbalanced educational opportunities for children. But while the organization gets a big chunk of its private donations from law firms — and experts say big firms can be reluctant to donate to public interest groups involved in highly contentious issues due to fears of offending clients — Public Counsel said it recently has seen its contributions increase.

Last year, donations fueled 33 percent of Public Counsel's $8.76 million budget revenues, a 1 percent increase from the previous year. The group's overall revenue, which also includes a series of fees, grants and interest on lawyer trust accounts, increased $600,000 since 2010.

Venture capital: a dysfunctional system?

During these the dark days of economic gloom in the U.S. and Europe, the U.S. venture capital-financed innovation system is widely admired and even envied globally. The roll call of new firms that received venture capital financing is incredible. Silicon Valley is a core symbol of the American brand of capitalism, in which a complex alchemy of venture capital, world-class universities, and a diverse population of talented people combine to produce a dynamic brew of innovative start-ups and new technologies.

Venture capitalists serve the function of recycling a small portion of institutional investors' funds into risky new ventures that, when considered as part of a portfolio, should have greater returns than common stock or some other benchmark. The social benefit is that new ventures capable of providing new growth are assisted during their earliest and most risky period. Importantly, this is a private sector solution through which entrepreneurs, venture capitalists and institutional investors can benefit, as well as society.

During the last five years, among some venture capitalists, limited partners and outside observers, there have been increasing murmurs of disquiet concerning the operation of the venture capital system.

Last month, the Kauffman Foundation, an organization that is normally bullish on entrepreneurship, on the basis of its $250 million portfolio of VC investments, released a startling report on its performance. The report provides conclusive evidence that for most limited partners, today's VC model is dysfunctional and probably, given the problems, not economically sustainable.

Public Counsel assumes a more aggressive stance

opped its Public Counsel contribution from $35,000 in 2011 to $50,000 this year.

"In theory, firms could be reticent to get involved" with public interest law organization work involving hot-button issues, said Deborah L. Rhode, Ernest W. McFarland Professor of Law at Stanford Law School who is an expert in public policy and ethics and has written a book studying lawyers' pro bono work.

In the 2000s, she said, some firms experienced "pushback" for representing Guantanamo Bay defendants pro bono, with critics suggesting that other firm clients "pull their business" because of the controversial nature of the case involving terrorism defendants. But the firms didn't lose business as a result, and Rhode said lawyers at other firms in fact began trying to solicit Guantanamo-related work.

She said "there's often a tradeoff involved" when firms take up highly contentious pro bono issues.

"You get more visibility with the more high-profile cases," she said. Also, the public interest organization is perceived as "doing important work."

Hernan Vera, who spearheaded Public Counsel's culture shift four years ago when he took the reins as president and CEO, said that since the group began litigating more aggressively, "there hasn't been pullback" from donors or law firms that partner with it on pro bono matters.

"If anything, it's increased the excitement from supporters that we're doing more."

The 42-year-old public-interest law office of the Los Angeles County and Beverly Hills bar associations previously partnered with law firms on major civil rights issues but tended to take matters for thousands of individual clients on a case-by-case basis. But in 2009 it significantly increased and broadened its litigation efforts when it brought on board Catherine Lhamon, the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California's hard-charging former assistant legal director, to head Public Counsel's newly created impact litigation division.

"I think over the past few years — and especially with Catherine being head of impact litigation and with leadership giving her free rein to develop a docket consistent with its overall goals — [Public Counsel] has become a very major force in the civil rights community," said Mark D. Rosenbaum, chief counsel of the ACLU of Southern California.

In the past three years, Lhamon — whose ACLU resume included successfully defending a desegregation program for Los Angeles public schools and fighting racial profiling of students by Los Angeles sheriff's deputies — strengthened the organization's courtroom presence in a flurry of closely followed cases. Those have included serving as co-counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Community Action League — an Antelope Valley residents' group — and several low-income people in a suit accusing the cities of Lancaster and Palmdale of harassing and intimidating black and Latino families who use Section 8 housing vouchers.

The 2011 case spurred a February settlement with Palmdale, which agreed to end discrimination against poor residents, including withdrawing a city-funded investigator who collected information on families receiving Section 8 help. The county also agreed to take steps to end harassment of such residents. Claims against Lancaster are pending.

In another big case, Public Counsel, the ACLU of Southern California and Morrison & Foerster LLP represented three middle schools in a suit against the Los Angeles Unified School District and the state, contending deep budget cuts and a rash of teacher layoffs at three low-performing campuses violated students' rights to a fair and equal education. In an October 2010 settlement, the district agreed to cap the number of teachers laid off from any single campus and to protect up to 45 low-performing district schools from suffering teacher layoffs during budget cuts.

It's increased the excitement from supporters that we're doing more.'

— Hernan Vera

Last July, in another headline-grabbing case, Public Counsel and Locke Lord Bissell & Liddell LLP reached a settlement with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the owners of the Holiday Venice apartment complex that Public Counsel said enabled hundreds of residents of one West Los Angeles' last affordable housing developments to hang onto their low-rent privileges.

Lhamon described Public Counsel's impact litigation boost as "exciting" and said it's "the right way to respond to the civil rights needs of the community."

After Vera took the organization's helm in 2008, replacing Dan Grunfeld, the group's president and CEO for a decade, he said he developed a "strategic plan" with board members and staff to "increase effectiveness" and expand issues "we've been working on for 40 years."

He said, "The main one that had the most support from the board and staff was developing a more aggressive litigation strategy."

Michael Soller, Public Counsel's spokesman, declined to discuss specific dollar amounts but said the group got "a financial commitment from the board to expand the scope of the work" and increased its fundraising to make it happen.

Grunfeld, now co-managing partner of the Los Angeles and Palo Alto offices of Kaye Scholer LLP, said impact litigation "has always been part and parcel of what Public Counsel has been involved in."

"It goes back to the olden days of Public Counsel," he said. "What has changed in recent years is the fact that impact litigation has become a dedicated project with more resources."

Public Counsel's concern about the Farmers Field project's impact on dwindling housing in downtown Los Angeles was its chief reason for jumping into the imbroglio over whether the development meets environmental standards, Vera said. Developer Anschutz Entertainment Group has said the project will be environmentally friendly, with a range of "green" details, but in their 77-page letter, Public Counsel and Legal Aid urged Los Angeles officials to revise and recirculate the development's voluminous draft environmental report. They argued the report made only " cursory mention" of the project's impact on surrounding housing.

Armbruster Goldsmith & Delvac LLP partner William F. Delvac, an attorney for AEG, said his client isn't "overly concerned" about the letter. "We believe the EIR is legally adequate and its conclusions are supported."

Vera said his group's decisions to criticize the AEG project and to wage increasingly aggressive litigation hasn't led to trepidation among firms or companies that support Public Counsel. AEG isn't one of the group's donors. He said firms view the matters as ways to "showcase their legal skills" and to "have an enormous impact for good on the community."

David A. Lash, managing counsel of public interest and pro bono services at O'Melveny & Myers, said he'd be surprised if any "one stand or case or issue" would "have a major negative impact" on the group. Lash, who sits on the board of directors for public interest firm Bet Tzedek, has worked on cases with Public Counsel.

Carole E. Handler, of-counsel with Lathrop & Gage LLP and a former board member for Public Counsel who now sits on Bet Tzedek's board, said other California legal assistance nonprofits are gravitating toward taking bigger stands on issues affecting their clients and have recently formed impact litigation divisions to more aggressively tackle litigation.

Like Public Counsel, Bet Tzedek launched its impact litigation arm three years ago.

"I think our culture has changed," Handler said. "The kinds of people who go into public services and work for pro bono services... are very cognizant of the increasing disparity in incomes and the inability of people to accomplish things as individuals."

Entertainment Studios Inc. names first general counsel

By David McAfee
Daily Journal Staff Writer

Entertainment Studios Inc., a Los Angeles-based broadcast syndication company headed by comedian Byron Allen, announced Monday the addition of its first general counsel. The appointment is effective immediately.

Mark P. DeVitre was most recently general counsel at StarGreetz Inc., where he worked for two years. Prior to joining StarGreetz, he was senior vice president of business affairs and operations at Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc., senior vice president of operations at FX

Network and general manager of Fox Movie Channel.

Entertainment Studios, which operates six cable networks, including Carstv, Recipe.tv, Comedy.tv, Mydestination.tv, Pets.tv and Es.tv, is expanding its reach to include scripted programming, DeVitre said.

"Entertainment Studios has a lot of interesting projects going on," he said. "It's been a really quiet player for many years, building up a really great business. I'm excited to be here for what I think will probably be its rocket-propelled launch into new areas of the business."

Growing disquiet surrounding venture capital system

See <http://www.kauffman.org/uploadedFiles/vc-enemy-is-us-report.pdf>.

After painstaking portfolio analysis, the conclusion of the Kauffman Foundation authors is quite simple and even stark, "based on our data, we've reached the conclusion that the LP investment model is broken." Their portfolio of venture investments is not out-performing, more liquid public market benchmarks. When the Kauffman results are combined with the recent spate of openly predatory IPOs culminating with the Facebook debacle, it seems legitimate to ask whether the current venture capital system is self-destructing.

From the limited partners' perspective, what do they identify as dysfunctional?

First, it is widely known that since venture capital investing is "home run business," and there are comparatively few home runs, returns are highly skewed. There is also path-dependence, so very successful venture capital firms attract the best entrepreneurs, thereby reinforcing their earlier success. Given the finite number of good deals and an objective limit to the amount of capital the best firms can deploy effectively, most limited partners cannot invest in the best VC firms and therefore, if investment managers have a mandated percentage for venture capital, they will be forced to invest in less successful VC firms that will almost certainly have inferior performance.

Second, the "2 and 20" investment structure (2 percent management fee and 20 percent share of appreciated capital that goes to venture partners) provides a concrete motivation for venture capitalists to raise as much capital as possible, after all their management fee increases as their managed capital increases. If the venture capitalists simply placed the funds in a small capital mutual fund after 10 years of compounding, they would be rewarded with 20 percent of whatever appreciation occurred — even if they did nothing! In other words, the VCs receive a handsome income from the management fee regardless of their performance. Moreover, as the Kauffman report reveals, all things being equal, the larger the fund, the less well it performs. Put simply, the venture capitalist's return increases, as that of their investor tends to decrease!

Most important, the preponderance of the venture funds, after fees etc., did not perform significantly better than a comparable small capital public equity portfolio.

Third, and most important, the preponderance of the venture funds, after fees etc., did not perform significantly better than a comparable small capital public equity portfolio. If this is the case, then the institutional investment managers are not meeting their fiduciary responsibility when they tie up capital for a decade with punitive early exit clauses and no better returns.

If we accept the conclusions of the Kauffman Report about the plight of the limited partners and combine them with the disappointing performances of deliberately over-hyped recent public offerings such as those in nanotechnology, Clean Technology, Groupon and Facebook, then there are reasons for concern about whether this remarkable American innovation for funding high-potential firms is being destroyed by insider greed. Further, can financial advisors any longer advise their clients to invest in venture capital or venture capital-financed IPOs?
